'Unenvied Resort of Defeated Tribes'

By Robert Lebling

Before Lawrence became a legend for his role in the Arab revolt in World War I, and Woolley achieved fame for his discovery of the royal treasures at Ur, the two Englishmen were young archeologists working together for the British Museum at a dig on the upper Euphrates. It was then that they were recruited by the Palestine Exploration Fund (PEF) to conduct an archeological survey of southern Palestine. This desolate area extends from northeast Sinai to Wadi Araba, the valley running south from the Dead Sea to the port of Akaba. It was called the Negeb desert then, the Negev today.

The authors' description of the area is probably Lawrence's: "The wearing monotony of senseless rounded hills and unmeaning valleys makes this southern desert of Syria one of the most inhospitable of all deserts - one which, since the [Muslim] invasion, has been the unenvied resort of defeated tribes too weak to face the strenuous life of the greater deserts." The survey provided cover for a secret British military mapping expedition, preparing for the impending war with Germany -- and with the Ottoman Turks, who ruled Palestine.

While British soldiers charted the desert, Woolley and Lawrence seriously went about doing archeology. Woolley concentrated on northern sites; Lawrence headed south for Akaba. This report details their findings - mostly ruins and inscriptions from Byzantine times - plus a few mysteries for good measure, like "the long and puzzling walls" of perfectly preserved dry stone "which ... appear to start and go on and end aimlessly" along hill-slopes for close to a mile, whose purpose was unknown even to local Bedouins.

The report, illustrated with maps, figures and photos, was first published in 1915 and reprinted in 1936 after Lawrence's death. This revised edition adds a wealth of new material, including details of the military mission from the PEF archives, and fascinating newspaper reviews of the 1936 edition.
